Foxtons Lettings Market Report

The lettings market continues to build momentum as we move further into the spring period. While renter demand remains below last year's levels, March performance shows continued recovery from the winter slowdown.

At the same time, supply is strengthening, giving renters greater choice. Budgets and achieved rents remain stable, indicating affordability pressures have not materially increased.

With the Renters' Rights Act now just weeks away, the market is entering a critical period. Current trends suggest a gradual shift towards more balanced conditions, as improving supply continues to ease pressure on renters while demand steadily rebuilds.

"The Renters' Rights Act comes into force 1 May, landing in a busy spring market. Between February and March, supply rose 11% while rents remained steady. As competition between landlords builds, pricing matters more than ever. Under RRA, you cannot accept offers above your asking price, so landlords need to be confident that asking prices reflect real demand in their local market. The broader reforms have been known for some time, and we are well prepared to help our clients transition to the new regulations. For well-presented homes priced sensibly, we expect activity to remain steady, with tenants willing to commit longer-term where they see value."

~ Gareth Atkins, Managing Director Lettings

"The Renters' Rights Act comes into effect next month, so by now documentation is prepped and operational shifts are bedded in. It is time to crack on. While parts of the wider PRS remain nervous, this is the landscape Build to Rent was designed for. RRA raises renter expectations of professionalisation in London's rental market, and no tenure delivers operational confidence and lived experience quite like BTR. Get agents selling the experience properly and residents seeing real value day to day, from the first advert they notice to their morning coffee in the residents' lounge, and 2026 sets up strongly."

~ Sarah Tonkinson, Managing Director Institutional PRS and Build to Rent

Applicant Demand

Applicant registrations remained below last year's levels but continued to recover as we moved into the spring market. Registrations in March were 10% lower year on year, although activity increased month on month.

This uplift reflects typical seasonal patterns; demand strengthening as renters re-entered the market ahead of the summer period. While below last year's peak levels, the trajectory is positive and indicates growing confidence among renters.

New Renters per New Instruction

Competitive pressure between renters eased further compared with last year. New renters per instruction were down 9.4% year on year, reflecting continued improvement in supply.

Month on month, the metric softened slightly again, suggesting that although demand picked up, increased supply levels gave renters more options.

Applicant Budgets

Renter budgets remained stable, averaging approximately £542 per week year to date by the end of March, up slightly year on year. This indicates that affordability held firm despite broader economic pressures.

Month on month, budgets remained largely unchanged, reinforcing the view that renter spending power was consistent as activity increased. Stability in budgets continues to underpin steady market performance.

Rent Achieved

Average rents achieved remained stable, increasing modestly to £568 per week, up around 1% year on year. This points to continued but controlled rental growth.

Month on month, rents edged up slightly, reflecting steady pricing as demand strengthened. The absence of sharp rental inflation suggests the market is stabilising as supply improves.

Renter Spend

Renters continued to spend a similar proportion of their budgets as last year, with the average at 99%. This indicates affordability through March remained broadly in line with previous levels.

Month on month, there was little change, suggesting that increased supply helped to offset any upward pressure from rising demand. Overall, affordability conditions remain stable as the market moves into a busier period.
